Call for Chapters: Book on Self-injury as Communication

Chapter proposals are invited for an edited book addressing communicative dimensions of self-injury (under contract with Lexington Studies in Health Communication). All chapters should clearly evidence communication as the central conceptual principle, applying one or more communication theories with respect to original data not published elsewhere. Data and analytical methods may be qualitative in approach, quantitative, or a combination of both.

The book will be organized into sections addressing general questions:

- In what ways is self-injury a form of communication, and what is being communicated?
- How do self-injurers communicate about self-injury?
- How does the self-injury/communication nexus vary across and within cultures?
- What roles do social media and mass media play in representing self-injury?
- What are best methods for communicating with self-injurers?
